

UNION CHAPEL, ISLINGTON, LONDON

Union Chapel was designed by James Cubitt and built in 1877 as a Congregationalist church. Today its great auditorium also plays host to a wide variety of concerts.

The organ was built for the new church by Henry Willis & Sons in 1877, and remains essentially unaltered. The only significant changes have been the replacement of the Choir Gemshorn 4ft by a 2ft Piccolo in 1909, the provision of electric blowing in the 1920s, and the installation of a balanced swell pedal in the 1940s.

As an important example of 'Father' Willis's work, the organ has undergone full restoration on historical principles. The original hydraulic blowing engines have been restored to working order by James Richardson-Jones and are retained as an alternative to electric blowing.

The organ and console are concealed by a stone screen behind the central pulpit.
